“I’m particularly happy that my personal friend for what is now over thirty years, Professor Sato, who followed our preparations for the introduction of deep economic and political reforms in Czechoslovakia with deep sympathy and understanding, is here with us today.”

“It didn’t work, it didn’t function”

28 “Taken together, there is a clear tendency toward a mixed economic system (of a ‘socialist type’, as Kornai put it), based on the recognition of the ‘universality’ of the market economy common to modern economic systems, capitalist or socialist...In this connection, the problem of effective macroeconomic policy (regulation) is gaining utmost importance....The difference between capitalist and socialist economic systems might be interpreted eventually not so much in terms of ownership and relations of plan and market, but in terms of effective macropolicy (regulation) exercised over the market with due attention to such values traditionally associated with socialist ideas, as security, stability, equality and solidarity”(Bogomolov, 1990, pp. 254-255).
